Abstract: The information collection includes closed-ended and open-ended responses to questions about forest restoration across the Hawaiian Islands, solicited from self-identified restoration practitioners, through an online survey (approximately 70–100 respondents) and semi-structured interviews (20–40 participants). The objective of this effort is to gather information and identify emergent themes and patterns drawn from personal perspectives and narratives not otherwise captured in ecologically-focused studies. This will aid researchers in identifying ways to improve the effectiveness and scaling up of forest restoration efforts in alignment with broadly stated ecosystem restoration goals of local NGOs to state, federal, and inter-governmental organizations.
